We strolled to the Chinese Temple Garden, a lush but simple retreat from the streets that cover the acres, a renovation site originally built in 1600s China and moved by stone to stone in Montreal in 1990. When we approached the massive gate, it was blocked. I panicked, ready to claim entry after driving 400 miles from another country to see it. Robert calmly, like the Eastern sage himself, treated the situation as a koan, a riddle that must be visited until the most assumptions are shifted. He began to walk on the outer wall of the garden. It seemed insurmountable. I was upset. He continued to walk slowly along the high wall. Since the garden is stretched over acres, I wondered if we would have to walk around the perimeter. The thought made me cranky. He kept walking. Suddenly, when we went further than initially, in our opinion, the walls disappeared. It turned out that there are no walls in the garden, except for the facade at its entrance. So we just walked through the open grass on the path that greeted us. How many thresholds that appear to be blocked or or blocked, seems only so from their initial viewing? How many opportunities for true life without barriers if we can only remove ourselves our minds from their traditional entry points? Record?
